LAST CALL FOR REGGAE?

Amid licensing battle in Lincoln Park, club is running out of time

Chicago Tribune

The Wild Hare was supposed to be a club in Lincoln Park where friends enjoyed a drink and listened to live reggae songs, much the way patrons did during the joint's 25-year run in Wrigleyville.

But most of those plans are on hold. Amid opposition from neighborhood residents and Ald. Michele Smith (43rd), the club's ownership team twice has failed to secure a public place of amusement license, meaning it can't host the reggae concerts owners say are needed to pay the bills. The dispute has devolved into a legal scrum with racial overtones, and there's a real chance that The Wild Hare will soon become rabbit stew.

The new club at 2610 N. Halsted St. opened in August, but its four owners haven't been able to offer much more than coconut shrimp, Red Stripe beer and videos of past performances by reggae greats. The stage at the club's center sits empty each weekend, as do many of its bar stools.

More than half of the voters living within 250 feet of The Wild Hare petitioned for a denial of the amusement license, called a PPA, which prompted a public hearing. The club's neighbors expressed a host of concerns, including that it would make traffic and parking even harder in the densely packed North Side community. They also worried about noise, and they told a hearing officer that inebriated patrons might cause disturbances in the neighborhood after the club's late closing time.

"I just knew it had been in the Wrigleyville area for a long time and didn't sound like a fit with our neighborhood," said Cynthia Safford, who signed the petition and lives on a residential block behind the club. "I was really concerned about the late-night hours and the congestion."

But the owners said they have been singled out because of their racial backgrounds and misunderstandings about reggae music, a Caribbean genre popularized by Bob Marley and others. Three Wild Hare owners are black and one is white. The white owner, William Glas-tris, said he's been called "white trash." The black owners say they have been encouraged to take the club to their "own neighborhood."

Smith, whose ward includes The Wild Hare and the affluent surrounding neighborhood, said race had nothing to do with her opposition to the license or its eventual denial.

"In Lincoln Park," she said, "people are very concerned about excessive traffic and late-night hours on places that are next to residential streets. That's all it was about."

DID YOU KNOW?

During Wild Hare's Wrigleyville days, famous acts such as Jimmy Cliff and Ziggy Marley (Bob's son) graced the stage. Pictures of those reggae greats line the walls between the Halsted location's stage and bar.

Safford said race didn't matter to her—she'd feel the same way if someone wanted to host country music concerts in that space.

Club owners said they were willing to help clean up after patrons and provide parking options. They also found an expert who testified that the club wouldn't have much effect on traffic on the busy stretch of Halsted Street.

Still, the hearing officer ruled against the club in June. The license was again denied in the fall. The owners, who did secure a general liquor license, are now appealing the PPA denial in Cook County Circuit Court's Chancery Division, which often deals in fore-closures. Glas-tris worries that his club will be out of business before the appeal is heard. The Wild Hare's current business model is unsustainable, owners said.

"This is a pretty desperate situation," Glas-tris said. "We've been at this now for a year and the city has, unfortunately, done every-thing it can to drive us away. We've tried everything we know to work this out amicably."

Chicago rides like it's 1990

GOING PUBLIC

Tracy Swartz

 tschwartz@tribune.com
 @tracyswartz

The CTA logged 2.4 percent more rides last year compared with 2011 and recorded its best ridership year since 1990, the agency said Monday.

Most of the increase was on the rail side, which saw a 4.2 percent jump over 2011. Bus ridership saw a 1.1 percent rise, CTA data shows.

The CTA recorded 545 million rides in 2012, up from 532 million in 2011. The 2012 number was the highest annual total for the CTA in 22 years, agency spokeswoman Tammy Chase said.

"Customers chose affordable, reliable public transit over high gas prices during a slow economic recovery, and recognized and appreciated the investment CTA made in its system, which included station renewal efforts and slow zone removals," Chase said.

The rail station that saw the highest percentage of growth was the Rosemont Blue Line station (13.8 percent), followed by the Cermak-Chinatown Red Line station (13.2 percent).

Those numbers aren't unexpected. The Rivers Casino in Des Plaines opened in 2011 and provides free shuttle service from the Rosemont Blue Line. Meanwhile, Cermak-Chinatown renovations, which included entrance closures, were completed last spring after a semitruck crashed into the station in 2008.

The news wasn't all good for the CTA, which saw ridership dip in December by 1.8 percent. Bus ridership was down 3.1 percent last month while rail ridership was up 0.1 percent.

That month, average weekday ridership on trains was down 0.7 percent compared with December 2011. Fewer people boarded the Pink, Green and Red lines on an average weekday than during the previous year.

Chase said the December ridership dip could be blamed on high numbers in December 2011, when temperatures were warm and Christmas fell on a Sunday. This year, Christmas was on a Tuesday, which affected weekday ridership numbers, Chase said.

Other factors that could have affected December ridership numbers include the CTA's decrowding plan, which added buses to 48 routes and trains during rush hour to all but the Yellow and Pink lines. More than a dozen full or partial bus routes were cut as part of that plan, implemented in mid-December. The CTA disputes the decrowding plan had any effect on December numbers.

Also last month, the CTA completed its renovation of seven North Side Red Line stations, which closed for six weeks apiece as the agency painted walls, fixed lighting and improved track.

STATIONARY A weekly dispatch from a CTA station of note

This week: Wellington Brown Line
 The Wellington stop in Lakeview saw one of the highest rates of ridership growth among Brown Line stations—6.7 percent increase in 2012 over 2011—but those aren't real riders crowding outside the station. The art on the stationhouse windows, from 2009, portrays silhouettes of riders passing through the station and waiting for the train, according to the CTA. Perhaps the art should be updated to reflect the 2012 service changes plan, which added more trains to the Brown Line during morning rush hour to reduce the crowds waiting for the train—real or fake.

Graph Search 101

By Adam Lukach | REDEYE

Since Facebook announced its new Graph Search engine last week, the social media giant has begun rolling out the much-hyped new feature to more and more users. But why has this been lauded as a potential game changer? And why should you care? Here are five things that set Graph Search apart:

Search specifics

Facebook still will divide search results into groups like photos and games, but users can add qualifiers to gather more specific results within users' profiles, such as "Photos I have liked from before 1995" or "Music my friends from Chicago like."

Applies to services and businesses

You can find restaurants, hairstylists and just about any other business with a Facebook presence by using variables such as type, location and popularity.

Intuitive interactions

Graph Search has an auto-complete-esque feature that tries to add qualifiers it thinks you want, such as photos with a specific friend. If you're looking for a salon, for example, it can recommend a specific stylist whom a friend has posted positively about before. As profiles and information become more interconnected, the search becomes more predictive and effective.

More than your friends' content

Say you're looking for photos taken in a certain place or posts about a certain topic. With Graph Search, your results are no longer limited to what your friends have shared, but you can find information and photographs from all users on the network, provided their privacy settings aren't locked down tightly.

Goes beyond URL

Facebook will understand if what you're looking for is not available on the home site and is working with Bing to widen its search scope. Some basics, like the weather forecast, will appear directly on Facebook without even needing another click.

Beyoncé's earpiece

NO STOPPING BEYONCE

Earpiece? Beyoncé doesn't need a stinking earpiece. During her rendition of the national anthem—which, like the Whos singing in “How The Grinch Stole Christmas,” started low, then grew—Bey yanked out her earpiece, which seemed to be having feedback issues. She never missed a beat, and made a beeline for the president when the song was over.

LUPE'S FIASCO

Obama has the support of plenty of artists and Chicagoans, but Lupe Fiasco isn't one of them. During a Sunday night pre-inauguration concert, the Chicago rapper, who called Obama a terrorist during a 2011 interview, was asked to leave the stage after performing an anti-war rap that included the lyrics: “Gaza Strip was getting bombed, Obama didn't say That's why I ain't vote for him, next one either.”

Michelle's gown by Jason Wu

GIRLS ON FIRE

Though this year featured just two inaugural balls instead of 2009's 10, the celebration was no less flashy. President Obama donned a white tie and Michelle Obama wore a red, halter-style gown by Jason Wu as they twirled to performances of “Girl on Fire” by Alicia Keys and Al Green's “Let's Stay Together,” sung by Jennifer Hudson at the Commander in Chief's Ball. Wu also created Michelle Obama's 2009 inaugural ball gown—can't argue with a favorite.

THE BIG SHOW

Funny, fascinating and ‘OMG!’ moments from Obama's second inauguration

By Dana Moran | REDEYE

An estimated 700,000 people flocked to Washington, D.C., on Monday to watch President Obama take the oath of office for the fourth time (the flubbed one in 2009, the do-over in 2009, the official one in 2013 and Monday's ceremony) as millions more tuned in around the world. On a day of American flags and serious fanfare, there were a ton of moments that made President Obama's second inauguration almost as entertaining as it was historic. Here's what made a political event a pop culture spectacle. DAMORAN@TRIBUNE.COM | @REDEYEDANA

MISSING MITT

While vice presidential nominee Paul Ryan showed up for the big day—he still is a U.S. representative, after all—former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney was nowhere to be found. Instead, he reportedly was at one of his homes in La Jolla, Calif., where an aide told NBC he and wife Ann had “big plans” that probably didn't involve watching the inauguration. Former President George W. Bush was absent as well, though former President Bill Clinton was there to photobomb Kelly Clarkson's performance.

POLITICAL RUNWAY

With temps in the 40s, inauguration attendees could afford to get a little more liberal with their fashion choices compared with 2009's 28-degree noontime high. The president chose to forgo an overcoat during the ceremony, but Michelle Obama rocked a print coat by Thom Browne (1), Sasha (2) wore Kate Spade and Malia (3) wore J. Crew. Other fashionable attendees included Beyoncé in a Pucci gown and Dior coat, Katy Perry (4) in a striped coat and suede boots, James Taylor (5) in his finest fleece jacket and Justice Antonin Scalia (6) in some manner of old-timey hat.

IN FRANCO'S WORDS

James Franco must be really peeved that Richard Blanco was chosen as the inaugural poet instead of him—or he's just really, really starved for attention. Franco penned his own piece, titled “Obama in Asheville” (though in the poem, Franco's the one in Asheville), that details important anecdotes like a trip to a burrito joint, F. Scott Fitzgerald's suicide attempt and that one time when Franco actually met Obama. Only one of these things is actually relevant.

THE OBAMA WOMEN—IN GIFS

The ladies Obama turned out in style to support the president Monday, but their really great moments didn't happen on purpose. As her mom was introduced on the dais, 14-year-old Malia did a cute shoulder shrug/pop-lock dance. As her dad spoke about education, 11-year-old Sasha let out a giant yawn. And, during a post-inaugural lunch, Michelle let out a massive eye roll at whatever House Speaker John Boehner had to say. Lucky for us, they've all been captured in GIF form—check redeyechicago.com for the evidence.

WHO MADE THIS SEATING CHART?

Hey, how the heck did Eva Longoria get up there? The New York Times' website published a nifty interactive graphic that lets users scroll over the inaugural platform—kind of a political “Where’s Waldo?” Among our findings: Eva Longoria had a better seat than the governor of New Hampshire; Obama’s 2008 opponent, John McCain, had a better seat than 2012 Republican VP nominee Paul Ryan; and there were a SHOCKING number of empty seats. Like, more than two.

HAIL TO THE TWEET

While Twitter did seem to slow down during President Obama’s speech, plenty of celebs were ready to share their thoughts on Monday’s celebrations:

Alicia Keys: What a powerful day!! May we all take these powerful strides and continue moving forward!! Blessings!!

Neil Patrick Harris: A brilliant speech today by @BarackObama. Inspiring stuff. I’m very proud to be an American.

Andy Cohen: Thank you @BarackObama and #godblessamerica - ps. Hunty Michelle’s hair is LAYED!

Wanda Sykes: James Taylor is so cool. Even when he tries to dress up, he still looks like he should be sitting by a lake.

Patti Stanger: Cryin from @kelly_clarkson and the mention of equality for all! If this happens nationwide i will need to hire a bigger gay staff! Yippee!

ONE LAST LOOK

While Monday was a day of celebration for the president, it also carried a fair dose of nostalgia—it was perhaps the last time he’d see a crowd this size turned out in his honor. As he exited the inaugural platform at the end of the ceremony, Obama took a lengthy pause to survey the hundreds of thousands of people before him. He could be heard saying:

“I want to take a look, one more time. I’m not gonna see this again.”

President Obama delivers his inaugural speech.

Obama’s priorities: Climate, gay marriage, immigration

Reuters

WASHINGTON A confident President Obama kicked off his second term Monday with an impassioned call for a more inclusive America that rejects partisan rancor and embraces immigration reform, gay rights and the fight against climate change.

Obama’s ceremonial swearing-in at the Capitol was filled with traditional pomp and pageantry, but it was a scaled-back inauguration compared with the historic start of his presidency in 2009, when he swept into office on a mantle of hope and change as America’s first black president.

Despite expectations tempered by lingering economic weakness and a divided Washington, Obama delivered a preview of the second-term priorities he intends to pursue, stating that Americans “are made for this moment” and must “seize it together.”

His hair visibly gray after four years in office, Obama called for an end to the political partisanship that marked much of his first term in the White House in bitter fights over the economy with Republicans.

“We cannot mistake absolutism for principle, or substitute spectacle for politics, or treat name-calling as reasoned debate,” Obama said from atop the Capitol steps overlooking the National Mall.

Touching on the kind of volatile issues rarely mentioned in inaugural speeches, Obama ticked off a series of liberal causes he plans to push in this second term.

On gay rights, Obama insisted: “Our journey is not complete until our gay brothers and sisters are treated like anyone else under the

REPEAT PERFORMANCE

When President Obama raised his right hand and was sworn in by Chief Justice John Roberts, it was his second time taking the oath in 24 hours. Obama had a formal swearing-in Sunday at the White House because of a constitutional requirement that the president take the oath Jan. 20. Rather than stage the full inauguration on a Sunday, the main public events were put off until Monday.

law, for if we are truly created equal, then surely the love we commit to one another must be equal as well.”

During the past year, the president has said he personally supports gay marriage but that the issue needs to be decided on a state-by-state basis. Currently, nine states authorize same-sex marriages. The Supreme Court has agreed to hear two gay marriage cases in late March, and both pose questions about equal rights for same-sex couples.

Obama also made a relatively long reference to the need to address climate change, which he mostly failed to do in his first four years.

“We will respond to the threat of climate change, knowing that the failure to do so would betray our children and future generations,” the president said.

And in a nod to America’s fast-growing Hispanic population, which helped catapult him to re-election in November, he said there was a need to “find a better way to welcome the striving, hopeful immigrants who still see America as a land of opportunity.”

Rooftop businesses fear sight lines may be blocked by changes to Wrigley. CHRIS SWEDA/TRIBUNE FILE

Rooftop clubs raise concerns

Chicago Tribune

Wrigleyville's alderman said Monday that a recent proposal by Chicago Cubs owners to pay for renovations at Wrigley Field by relaxing advertising restrictions and other rules at the landmark ballpark is just one of many ideas being floated to pay for the work.

But Ald. Tom Tunney (44th) did not rule out easing city landmark rules that make it difficult for the team to erect lucrative billboards, a key component in the proposal by team CEO Tom Ricketts to foot the bill for the entire $300 million rehab without going to taxpayers. The previous plan to tap public amusement tax revenue was greeted coolly by Mayor Emanuel.

"I think a lot of balloons are being floated," Tunney said. "A lot of what they said has not been presented to the community."

He said Cubs officials would need to negotiate with the owners of rooftop clubs overlooking Wrigley, who gave an icy reception Monday to the idea of new signs that could block their views.

"The rooftops are a fabric of the experience at Wrigley Field," Beth Murphy, a member of the Wrigleyville Rooftop Association and owner of the bar Murphy's Bleachers, said in a statement. "Any relaxation of the landmark ordinance that blocks our views violates our current 20-year contract with the Cubs and would jeopardize the tremendous economic contribution rooftops make to Chicago as businesses, taxpayers and members of the community."

Prince Harry: I killed insurgents

LONDON Britain's Prince Harry says he killed Afghan insurgents during conflicts with the Taliban while on his second tour of duty in Afghanistan where he was a gunner in Apache attack helicopters.

Queen Elizabeth's 28-year-old grandson, third in line to the British throne, will return home later this week after a 20-week posting with NATO forces at the Camp Bastion military base in the southern province of Helmand.

Asked before he left Afghanistan if he had killed insurgents during his tour, he said: "Yeah, so, lots of people have. ... Yes, we fire when we have to, take a life to save a life, but essentially we're more of a deterrent than anything else."

"If there's people trying to do bad stuff to our guys, then we'll take them out of the game, I suppose," the second son of the late Princess Diana and Prince Charles, heir to the throne, said in one of several interviews released to the media.

The Taliban had said it would do its utmost to kidnap or kill Harry during his tour, and an Afghan insurgent warlord labeled him a drunken "jackal" out to kill innocent Afghans.

His base was attacked on his birthday last September, but it was never clear if he was the target or if the Taliban raid, in which two U.S. Marines were killed, was in response to a film that was seen as insulting to the Prophet Muhammad.

ICYHOT

Winter warriors keep fit in the coldest conditions—so what's your excuse?

By Tracy Swartz

REDEYE

If you're wondering who invited Jack Frost to stick around Chicago, it was Joanne Singleton of Lincoln Park.

When Singleton was training last winter for a 50K (31-mile run) in Alaska, she savored the ice and cold. After a heavy snow, she would take a Metra train to Highland Park at sunrise and run more than 20 miles on trails near there before they were plowed.

This year, she's had to wait a bit longer for winter, her beloved running partner, Chilly Willy.

"It's my favorite time of the year," said Singleton, 40. "If you have the right running gear, you can run in any weather. I absolutely love it."

While some Chicagoans were elated that 60-degree weather made a cameo in December, Singleton is one of few Chicago winter warriors who revel in training and participating in cold-weather sports. These subzero heroes prefer to bask in the snow, ice, slush, base layers, neck warmers, running tights and wool socks that accompany winter.

They'll get their chance to compete against Mother Nature these next few days. The National Weather Service expects wind to make the Windy City feel like it's 20 degrees below zero Tuesday, and the bitter cold is expected to stick around for the rest of the week.

This is good news for Paolo Urizar of Peterson Park, who calls himself a "dirtbag" because of his love for off-road cycling. In 2004, when he attended the Illinois State CX Championships at Montrose Harbor, he marveled at cyclists battling it out in the snow and found a new love: competing in the winter.

Urizar, 38, competed in the USA Cycling CX National Championships earlier this month in Madison, Wis., and is training for the Southern Cross 50-mile bike race in February in Georgia, where nasty weather is a possibility. He said training in Chicago in the winter gives him a leg up on competitors from

"Especially in cases of bike handling ... it definitely gives me a bit of an advantage dealing with subzero weather," said Urizar, who routinely bikes to his job downtown. "I'm comfortable being prepared for the winter."

To combat the cold and ice and frozen mud when he's riding his handmade bike along the trails, Urizar said he wears two or three layers, including a base layer that wicks away moisture. When the temperature drops he wears a balaclava, headgear that exposes only part of the face, and when it hits subzero he wears ski goggles.

It's important to bundle up when exercising outdoors, said Jim Winger, a Loyola assistant professor of family medicine. While there are concerns about overheating and dehydration when running in very hot temperatures, Winger said there are fewer worries about training in extreme cold.

"When you are active and doing something athletic like running, you raise your own core temperature. When you're running in the cold, that works to your advantage," Winger said. "If you cover up enough to literally protect yourself from the elements or wind or protect yourself from heat loss, you can exercise safely in nearly every common temperature you'll see."

Kimberley Stedman of the Near East Side tends to wear multiple layers (no more than three) when she's running outside in the cold, but she usually skips the headgear. Instead she carries water in a fuel belt, since the Chicago Park District shut off most water fountains along the lakefront path before Halloween.

The lakefront path is where she has hosted the F³ Half Marathon in January since 2010. (F³ stands for [Bleeping] Freezing Frozen.) Each year the race has lived up to its name, yet it continues to attract more runners—from 100 its inaugural year to 1,850 runners this year, a sellout.

"We never thought it was going to be this big," said Stedman, 30. "We found a niche. I think we found a good little network of crazy runners."

For as much interest as there is in running in the winter, there aren't many race options in Chicago before the April 7 Shamrock Shuffle, the unofficial start to spring running season.

F^3 will be held Saturday. The Chi-Town Big Game 10K/5K is set for Feb. 3, while a 1-mile undie run in Wrigleyville is slated for Feb. 9.

For their part, Singleton and Stedman will spend the winter months outside training for upcoming races outside Chicago.

Stedman is training for the Illinois half-marathon in Champaign in April and the Chicago Spring Half Marathon in May.

Singleton, who said all of her personal records have come in cold-weather races, is training for the Illinois Marathon in April and a May Ragnar relay from Plymouth to Provincetown, Mass. On the trail, she'll join elite runners training for the Boston Marathon in April.

If you spot Singleton along the lakefront, she'll probably be wearing thermal underwear, wool socks and a smile.

"In the winter when I run outside, everyone I meet is smiling. We're just as crazy as each other," Singleton said. "We're out there because we love running."

1 How are you preparing for the Blackhawks' home opener Tuesday?	The same way I prepared when it should have happened three months ago.	Raising a banner ad.	Mostly avoiding North Avenue.	I'm wearing extra deodorant to the game so I'm not mistaken for a Blues fan.	Wait ... the strike is over? Huh.
2 What will the Blackhawks do in Daniel Carcillo's absence?	I don't know but they better fill his roster spot with another Italian.	Toews is going to have to throw down.	Find a forward who doesn't sound like he "whacks" people for a living.	Not make stupid penalties 150 feet from their own net. That's what.	Order him a plastic bubble to play in.
3 When Katie Couric interviews Mantel Te'o America will have stopped caring (hopefully).	... he won't be able to name a single Supreme Court case.	... he'll really open up during the 15 minutes she's in the bathroom.	... It will be revealed that it's not Couric doing the interview, but an imaginary Katie Couric!	... we'll finally get to meet the boyfriend he's been covering up!
4 Let's have your Super Bowl prediction.	Ditka 345, Harbaugh's 0.	GoDaddy's ad will set women athletes back only three years.	The football game will serve as nice opening and closing acts for Beyonce.	Beyonce's legs win in a rout.	Hopefully Beyonce will perform in her GQ cover outfit. We all win.
5 What would it take for the Cubs to forgive Sammy Sosa?	An advanced copy of "Sammy's Salsa Sensation" for the clubhouse stereo.	$300 million in public funding.	He's gotta be Ronnie Woo-Woo for a day.	Sammy needs to give up that pasty de-colorizing facial wax. Ick.	An interview with Oprah where he apologizes for his Pinterest board.

It's early, but we know enough to make some Hawks guesses

RedEye

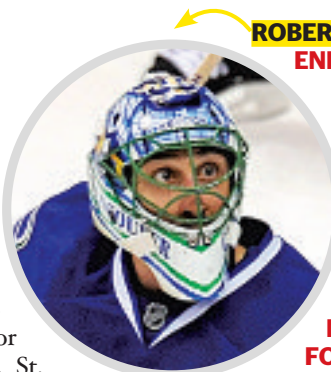

Sure, two games out of 48 is a small sample size. But as the Blackhawks prepare for Tuesday's home opener vs. St. Louis, we've got enough to evaluate a few of the interesting developments so far. Here are the chances that ...

BRANDON BOLLIG HAS THE BEST TWITTER FEED ON THE TEAM

50% From where he eats to players he fights with to interacting with followers, Bollig has a lot to say. He'll get a run for his money from Bryan Bickell, who often posts pictures on his feed.

MARIAN HOSSA LEADS THE LEAGUE IN SCORING

15% With one-24th of the season in the books, Hossa already has four goals and an assist to tie him for the NHL lead in points. He's got the skill to dominate, but as usual, the question is whether he can stay injury-free.

ROBERTO LUONGO

ENDS UP A BLACKHAWK

1% Hawks goalies Corey Crawford and Ray Emery will see plenty of playing time, and now Henrik Karlsson's aboard. But are they expendable? And would Chicago implode if Luongo were traded here? Hmmm ...

MARIAN HOSSA IS AS FORGIVING AS HE SOUNDS

20% After suffering a nasty concussion the last time the Hawks played Phoenix, Hossa tried to wipe the slate clean Sunday: "I came to the game [with] no hard feelings," Hossa said. "I tried to take it as another game for me and just prepared as I always do." That's easy to say when the guy who treated your head like a pinata, the Coyotes' Raffi Torres, didn't play. We'll see what happens when he does.

COACH Q'S MUSTACHE REMAINS CHICAGO'S FINEST FACIAL HAIR

99% Even when the Hawks grow playoff beards, they still bow in deference to Joel Quenneville's push broom. Cubs pitcher Jeff Samardzija might disagree, but even he's not in Coach Q's league just yet.

A bridesmaid no more

Olympic figure skater Michelle Kwan, who never did win that elusive gold medal, tied the knot this weekend, according to the Providence Journal. Her new husband is Clay Pell, grandson of former Rhode Island Sen. Claiborne Pell. Kwan, 32, won silver at the 1998 Winter Games and bronze in 2002.

International Lampoon: Armstrong edition

It's a prank that would make The Onion proud. A fake note in an Australian library declaring that disgraced cyclist Lance Armstrong's books would be moved to the fiction section has gone viral. "All Non-Fiction Lance Armstrong Books, including 'Lance Armstrong—Images of a Champion,' 'The Lance Armstrong Performance Program' and 'Lance Armstrong: World's Greatest Champion,' will soon be moved to the fiction section," read the sign posted at Sydney's Manly Library on Saturday. Ooohhh, burn!

Selena Gomez might need advice on these potential crises

By Dana Moran | REDEYE

When you break up with your longtime honey boo boyfriend, the first thing you need is your besties—and probably vodka. Selena Gomez has at least one of those things covered, she told People mag: her buds Taylor Swift and Vanessa Hudgens. "It's helped having Taylor and Vanessa both be older than me. They've kind of experienced a little bit more, and at the same time we're experiencing the exact same things together," she said. Just what kind of advice are T-Swizzle and V-Hudge dealing out? We took a wild guess. DMORAN@TRIBUNE.COM | @REDEYEDANA

Return to sender

Ten years after the release of their first and only album, "Give Up," Ben Gibbard and Jimmy Tamborello of electronic duo The Postal Service announced plans to reunite this year for a tour that will include a performance at California's Coachella music festival in April. No word yet on exact tour dates.

"Honestly, I'm happy with myself if I'm a little heavier. ... I think I'm beautiful either way."

That's how many times Justin Timberlake's new track, "Suit & Tie," was played on the radio in its first week, billboard.com reports. That's the best first-week total in the 20-year history of Billboard's Pop Songs chart.

Apologies to Bieber

It was nice while it lasted, but James Franco has taken his parody of the music video for Justin Bieber's "Boyfriend" off his WhoSay page. "Bieber didn't contact me, but I don't think he was too happy," Franco told E! News. "I wasn't trying to diss him." In the video—which, BTW, still is on YouTube—Franco lip-synchs Bieber's parts while Franco's "Spring Breakers" co-star Ashley Benson dances with him.

Take the ring off it

Having recently announced the end of her engagement to Jason Trawick, Britney Spears has reason to free up her ring finger. Over the weekend, Brit, who is returning to her music after one season on Fox's "The X Factor," was photographed without her engagement ring. tmz.com reports. Ooo, scandalous! No, wait. It's the opposite of that.
